Since it began publication in 1975, Child: Care, Health and Development has become established among the leading publications in its field. Its purpose is to promote the study of the development of all the children, but particularly those handicapped by physical, intellectual, emotional and social problems, and to provide information on new methods to help overcome these problems. Contributions on all aspects of child care are welcomed, particularly those dealing with original work or expressing an authoritative viewpoint. Well-referenced comprehensive reviews, profiles of associations concerned with children, short reports, and letters commenting on published articles also appear. Frequent references to articles published in the journal are cited elsewhere in the literature, and this, together with its steadily increasing circulation, underlines its authority and value among paediatricians, therapists, psychologists, teachers and social workers.
